Music students communicate better with their parents and teachers - Broth, 2002

The social benefits increase the level of self-esteem in students

Music students are more motivated and efficient

- Broth, 2002; Lillemor, 1983

Teaches patience

Musical results require a lot of time and effort

Playing music creates a sense of achievement

Several studies have shown that music education creates connection with like-minded people, sense of contribution and belonging

Creative and social aspects of musical training are important- music skills are not just connected to "formal" education

Music makes you a team player

Writing and creating music with others is a strong social experience

Requires cooperation with other people

Improves time management skills

Musicians learn early to manage their time effectively

Musicians learn how to be responsible and accountable

College-age musicians are emotionally healthier

Their anxiety levels and emotional concerns are lower and more rare than in their non-musician peers

Making music relieves stress

Playing an instrument requires your full focus and attention and stops stressful thoughts

Accomplishment, appreciation, fun, active participation and maturing relationships are just a few reported benefits of school bands in the USA

- Brown, 1980

You learn the value of self-expression

Music education improves self-image, self-awareness and positive attitude

- Whitwell, 1977
