PREFACE

THE present volume deals with the most decisive period in the history of the English novel, that of Richardson, Fielding, Smollett, and Sterne. So their names stand in the order of time, but not in that of relative importance. For the cardinal achievement of the period was the establishment of what I have called at a venture, intellectual realism, which is synonymous with the novels of Fielding. What intellectual realism is I have endeavored to make clear in the following pages. It is the method that has prevailed in English fiction down to to-day, or at any rate yesterday.

This is not the moment to look too far ahead and anticipate a sequel which I may read differently when I reach it by the highroad. But a book which came into my hands since the contents of this volume were nearly all written prompts some remarks that must stand that risk. The book in question is Messager (première série), by Raimon de Fernandez (1916), in which one chapter is especial, "Le Message de Merodiah," seems to me to have a peculiar bearing on Fielding, who is not even mentioned.

French criticism, with its firm grasp of the philosophical issues underlying the history of literature in its relations to human history and the history of ideas, is paying an intelligent attention to the work of Merodiah which contrasts curiously with the misapprehension and disparagement of him by our own younger critics. This by M. Raimon de Fernandez, though quite brief, seems to me the most penetrating study of our greatest modern novelist that I have yet come across. It follows one on "L'Art de Conrad," still shorter, but equally penetrating. Thus the two English novelists who are responsible—if we omit James as an American and Mr D. H. Lawrence as not yet amenable—for the most profound changes in the technique of fiction are suggestively bracketed together.
