

Foreword

There are few critical, historical studies of the administration of an entire tax system of a country. The one by Doris¹ on the United States system is largely descriptive and contains little analysis or criticism, perhaps because it was not written by a tax expert. The useful, recent book by Chommie, a professor of tax law, is one of a series describing the federal agencies of the United States Government and focusing on current practice.² Sir Alexander Johnston's book³ on the British Board of Inland Revenue is a thorough study done by a long-time official in the administration. The present study of the Israeli system was written by a tax professional, long a tax lawyer and administrator in the United States Government. He served as an adviser to the Israeli Ministry of Finance for three years, from 1954 to 1957, and has had a long-time interest in the affairs of Israel, but sees the administration as a critical observer rather than as a participant.

A study of tax administration in Israel is particularly revealing because Israel has been in a period of continuing transition and repeated crises during its short life. Moreover, it is a country for which the tax system has almost from the beginning been much more than a device to raise money. It has been used consciously, often experimentally, as a means of facilitating or accomplishing economic and social ends. These tax policy objectives have meant that the system has changed frequently with respect to technical structure and distribution of tax burden. While these changes are not the subject of the present study, they are a crucial part of the background which is briefly set forth in Chapter 2.

In a relatively short period of time Israel has had to deal with the full panoply of problems that tax administrators must face. Perhaps uniquely in modern history — that is, since World War II — it has not only faced all these problems but there have been sufficient records kept in memoranda and published in journals to make Mr. Wilkenfeld's study possible. Moreover, most of the participants are still alive, and some of them have been able to cooperate with the author in amplifying the written record. The records, the author's extended stay in Israel, his continuing research thereafter, his recent visits to Israel, and his continuing direct
