The 1920s, especially after World War I, represented the flowering of the "New Criticism." At the time, literary criticism was dominated by the "New Criticism," which emphasized the formal analysis of literature. This approach focused on the text itself, rather than on the author's intentions or the reader's response. The New Critics believed that literature should be studied as a self-contained system of symbols and images, and that the meaning of a work should be derived from its internal structure. This approach was influential in the development of literary theory and criticism, and it continues to be a major influence on the study of literature today.

The Department of Agriculture's Wildlife Conservation and Management Division is currently conducting a study of the status of the world's wild bird populations. The study is being conducted in cooperation with the International Union for Conservation of Nature (IUCN) and the World Wildlife Fund (WWF). The study is being conducted in order to determine the status of the world's wild bird populations and to develop a plan of action to conserve them.
