Purpose: There is little known about the state of teacher education programs in this field. The aim of this article is to provide a descriptive analysis of physical education and health education teacher education programs in the United States. Method: Using published curriculums, a census of active undergraduate teacher education programs and a more in-depth analysis of one program from each state based on interviews with program coordinators was conducted. Findings: Data are reported across nine categories: (a) institution and program classifications, (b) degree designations, (c) degree and major's hours, (d) enrollment, (e) program status and trends, (f) admission and graduation requirements, (g) curricular time, (h) faculty demographics, and (i) health education. Conclusions: The data show that there is a broad interpretation of what counts as physical and health teacher education in terms of curriculum, and there are significant and pressing challenges for the field to address moving forward.

Keywords: teacher education curricula, preservice teachers, teacher educators, program demographics

There are longstanding criticisms of the effectiveness of teacher education programs (Korthagen, 2010; Stevenson et al., 2020; von Hippel & Bellows, 2018). Most significant among these criticisms is increasing evidence that teacher education is failing to prepare teachers for the complexities of teaching in PK-12 schools (Stevenson et al., 2020; von Hippel & Bellows, 2018). This has led to calls for change in the way teacher education programs are conducted (Darling-Hammond, 2021; Flores, 2016; Korthagen, 2010). Changes include moving away from both classroom-based learning about teaching in favor of more experiential learning and disciplinary coursework that is not aligned with what preservice teachers (PSTs) need to know to teach in schools (Ball & Forzani, 2009; Hammerness et al., 2005). Another change is strengthening PST's ability to apply their professional knowledge in different contexts (i.e., adaptive teaching; Ball & Forzani, 2009; Hammerness et al., 2005).

Similarly, in physical education, there have been calls for: (a) the use of core practices that define what teachers need to know (Ward, 2020); (b) increased use of scenario teaching, peer teaching, and field-based experiences (Ward et al., 2022); and (c) a focus on improving the adaptive competence of PSTs (e.g., Xie et al., 2021, 2022). There have also been calls for greater alignment between coursework and what teachers actually do as teachers.

These types of critiques are not limited to the various disciplinary knowledge bases in the curriculum, but the critiques can also be focused on specific teacher education classes such as pedagogy and content classes. For example, Kim et al. (2015) reported in their study of Physical Education Teacher Education (PETE) programs that the content knowledge that teachers are to teach in PK-12 physical education represented only 10.4% (range

4%–17%) of the total credit hours of the published undergraduate curriculum. A number of studies have assessed the health-related fitness knowledge and movement content knowledge of preservice and practicing teachers and these studies have shown that understanding of the content to be taught is around 60% as measured on knowledge tests (e.g., Santiago & Morrow, 2021; Tsuda et al., 2019; Ward et al., 2018). All of these studies are consistent with evidence from classroom research that teacher education is not as effective as it should be (Darling-Hammond, 2021; Stevenson et al., 2020; von Hippel & Bellows, 2018).

At present, PETE is occurring in a time that is post-COVID-19 which, among other things, has accelerated the use of virtual education in PETE and increased the mental health stress of teacher educators and PSTs, along with PK-12 teachers and students (Erwin et al., 2021). PETE is also occurring in a time when program closures are increasingly reported more frequently and when enrollment numbers in many programs are reducing (Ward et al., 2021). Third, PETE is occurring in a time of unprecedented teacher shortages (Sutcher et al., 2019). A recent Society of Health and Physical Educators (SHAPE) America report noted:

Consider three of the country's largest states: Florida, New York and California. In Florida, the Department of Education (2017) reported that the percentage of total courses taught in physical education by teachers not certified in the discipline statewide for 2014–15 was 58%. The New York City comptroller reported that of 1,700 public schools, 506 (32%) schools lacked a licensed physical education teacher, actions which violate the state's requirements for physical education (Stringer, 2015). In a survey of 200 California school districts, 12% of the districts ($n = 24$) reported shortages of physical education teachers (Podolsky & Sutcher, 2016). (Society of Health and Physical Educators [SHAPE] America and the National Association for Kinesiology in Higher Education [NAKHE], 2018, p. 2)

Yet we know little about PETE in the United States beyond a few studies and summary reports such as the one above. Metzler and Freedman (1985) examined the demographics of PETE faculty
