

Social Fears in Adolescence

The Social Anxiety and Avoidance Scale for Adolescents

Abstract. This study describes the development, factor structure, psychometric properties, and validity of the Social Anxiety and Avoidance Scale for Adolescents (SAASA). Two subscales assessing discomfort and avoidance of typical social situations faced by adolescents constitute the SAASA. Both subscales revealed good internal consistency and temporal stability. Convergent validity was determined comparing the Social Anxiety and Avoidance Scale for Adolescents (SAASA) scores to Social Anxiety Scale for Adolescents scores (SAS-A), scores for general anxiety (Revised Children's Manifest Anxiety Scale, RCMAS), and scores for depression (Children's Depression Inventory, CDI). Confirmatory factor analyses supported six distinct factors revealing different dimensions of social fears. The SAASA effectively discriminated between adolescents with social phobia with and without comorbid diagnoses, and adolescents with social phobia from adolescents with other anxiety disorders or without any disorder. These results suggest that the SAASA is a valid instrument to use in the clinical assessment and research on adolescent social phobia.

Introduction

Social anxiety disorder is a prevalent anxiety disorder in childhood and adolescence. Having a chronic course and being associated to the development of other emotional disorders, it has a significant impact on the child's or adolescent's life (Albano & Hayward, 2004; Beidel, Morris, & Turner, 2004; Morris, 2004; Rapee & Sweeney, 2001). The early onset of this disorder (usually during adolescence, although it can be diagnosed in any age) and the fact that it will not remit without adequate treatment give social phobia the potential to influence the individual's future, interfering in his or her physical, social, academic, or occupational functioning (Furmark, 2002; Stein & Gorman, 2001).

Even in face of the evident limitations and problems social phobia implies, several studies state that it remains insufficiently recognized and treated, often hidden by other disorders or incorrectly assessed as being, merely, an individual trait, and thus, not being a worthwhile target for a therapeutic intervention (Weiller, Bisschop, Lepine, & Leclercq, 1996; Stein, McQuaid, Laffaye, & McCabill, 1999; Kitzelnick & Greist, 2001). The difficulty in recognizing social phobia can be particularly evident during adolescence, because this phase is usually characterized by an increment of social anxiety due to new developmental tasks and challenges in this phase. Since high levels of social anxiety put the adolescent at risk of developing more severe long-range problems, it is important to alert parents, teachers, and clinicians to the need of identifying signs of distress associated to social problems as early as possible, so it may be possible to interrupt the anxiety process and to promote adequate behavior and functioning in adulthood.

The literature on clinical interventions in childhood and adolescence reveals a scarcity of specific information and assessment instruments for social anxiety and social phobia in adolescence. With the present study we hope to contribute to this area through the development of a self-report questionnaire that allows the identification of several dimensions of social fears in adolescents.

Self-report instruments are of great value to clinical investigation and practice since they allow a quick gathering of information according to the individual's own perspective. This kind of instruments raises several reliability and validity problems when applied to very young children, given their immaturity to conduct a self-reflection and the eventual difficulties in understanding the written questions. Nevertheless, investigation has shown that, as they grow older – namely, during adolescence – youngsters are gradually capable of answering self-report questionnaires in a rather valid and reliable way (Essau & Barret, 2001). Additionally, adolescents have shown to be more accurate sources of information than parents and teachers regarding information about their inner states (DiBartolo, Albano, Barlow, & Heimberg, 1998; Myers & Winters, 2002).

The wide use of self-report questionnaires in the assessment of big samples in prevention programs and epidemiological studies derives from the fact that they are time-saving procedures and facilitate young people's adherence, comparatively to interviews conducted by clinicians.

At the time we developed the Social Anxiety and Avoidance Scale for Adolescents (SAASA), only two specific self-report instruments to assess social anxiety and social
