

Field Marshal Sir John Durham, hero of two World Wars, had decided to tell the whole truth, in his memoirs, about the events and personalities of his illustrious career. And he began to carry out that decision with stern military discipline. He would leave nothing out, however painful, however cruel. There were many people who would be involved, perhaps embarrassed, perhaps destroyed, by what he had to reveal:

Martin Ruttledge, his aide in the last years of World War II, and later his son-in-law, knew many of the darkest secrets of the Field Marshal's life. He was personally implicated in the worst of them. But the ones he didn't know, and perhaps should have, were the most shocking of all. . . .

Lois Ruttledge, John Durham's daughter and Martin's wife, was indignant at her father's revelations. But she, too, had a past to conceal, if only the Field Marshal had let her. . . .

Caroline, her daughter, had been active in a radical movement at her university. But when she came home to help her grandfather research his memoirs, her real political education began. . . .

Sir Henry Bartlett, John Durham's superior officer during World War II, had a prestigious career in government. It was said that he coveted the post of Prime Minister, and might well get it. He would use every official and unofficial power at his command to see that the Field Marshal's memoirs never saw print. National Security was his justification, but personal security might have been his goal—depending on what it really was he wanted to hide. . . .

The Field Marshal would not be swayed by any consideration of tact or pride. He would strip away all the grand illusions of his past . . . until at last he came upon the strangest revelation of them all. . . .
