

AQUARIUMS AND EQUIPMENT

Aquariums

An aquarium is more than a container for holding water, or representing the nature world in which the fish community live in fact, therefore, before selecting an aquarium the needs of the fish should be the prime consideration. This does not mean that the most "useful" means for decoration, on the contrary, aquariums lend themselves admirably as attractive decorative equipment, but it is "putting the cart before the horse" to design a beautiful aquarium, if it does not fulfil its basic function of housing the fish community in a state conducive to a healthy existence.

The shape of the aquarium is the first consideration. The oxygen content of the water is more dependent upon the surface area than on the actual volume of water (see oxygen), therefore, the aquarium should not be too tall or narrow. For example, a tank 12 in. x 12 in. x 12 in. will contain one cubic foot of water with a surface of one square foot, the same quantity of water will be contained in a tank 24 in. deep x 24 in. x 12 in., but the surface area will have increased to two square feet.

This larger tank will permit a greater number of fish to exist in comfort than the one foot square tank, although both contain the same volume of water. It is now obvious that the large shaped aquariums that many aquarists like to have for the odd corner or shelf, although they may be decorative because of their unusual shape or size, are often unsatisfactory because of their small surface area. In addition to the narrow foot and rectangular, fish need plenty of space to develop. In the fish are restricted to an inadequate volume of water, or are limited by too small a surface area, the fish will be forced to adapt to the conditions and will remain small. Instead, as they will simply die. The most universal size tank in current fishkeeping is undoubtedly the standard 18 in. x 12 in. x 12 in., it is a size that is readily obtainable from any aquatic store, and has the necessary proportions to suit most purposes.
