The Foundations of Evolutionary Economics Geoffrey Martin Hodgson,1998 Foundations of Evolutionary Economics, Chapter One, Ontology Carsten Herrmann-Pillath,2013 This is an entirely new draft of the first chapter of my book Foundations of Evolutionary Economics which is going to be published by Edward Elgar in due course With permission of the publisher the draft chapters are posted on the SSRN website to facilitate academic discussion for further improvement A full summary of Chapter One can be found at the beginning of the main text I present a naturalistic ontology for economics which builds on Peirce s theory of signs and posits the principle of bimodality According to this view all phenomena can be analyzed in the matter-energy mode or the semeiotic mode I relate this distinction with the duality of two kinds of facts: observer relative and observer independent. Further I introduce a set of impossibility theorems which allow to specify the ontological constraints which every economic theory has to observe. For evolutionary economics the principle of consilience holds which implies that economics has to eschew the idea of axiomatic autonomy but aims at an integration across all sciences. Then economics appears to be the scientific discipline which deals with a particular kind of human artefacts, i.e. markets.

Foundations of Evolutionary Economics, Chapter Four Carsten Herrmann-Pillath, 2013. This is an entirely new draft of the fourth chapter of my book Foundations of Evolutionary Economics which is going to be published by Edward Elgar in due course. A full summary of chapter four can be found at the beginning of the main text. The chapter argues that the evolutionary notion of the individual is an abstract multi-level one including groups. This builds on an externalist approach to mind which I define as supervening on the brain and signs as physical entities. Drawing on neuroscience and evolutionary psychology I propose a dual selves model of the individual. In a dual selves model emotions and identity emerge as integrative concepts that explain the possibility of agency. Agency is distributed dual to the distributed nature of human knowledge. Against the background of an evolutionary theory of needs and wants, consumption is seen as a performative act.
