

Finding Absolute Zero

How can we model a relationship in the sciences?

When a relationship is model in the sciences, the graph looks like the relationship shown above. The relationship shows the relationship between the volume of a gas and the temperature. The relationship shows the relationship between the volume of a gas and the temperature. The relationship shows the relationship between the volume of a gas and the temperature.

In the 1700s, a French scientist named Jacques Charles discovered how gases change with temperature. He determined that if mass and pressure are kept constant, then the volume of a gas will change as the temperature changes. This is called Charles' Law, which can be found using the formula $\frac{V_1}{T_1} = \frac{V_2}{T_2}$.

Does anyone else think they are heated, but they are not? They are not. What if you could see that the molecules stopped moving around? That would make the molecules stop moving around. That would make the molecules stop moving around. That would make the molecules stop moving around.

Even though it is not possible to lower the temperature of a gas to absolute zero, you can do an experiment that will give you a value for the relationship between gas and volume. Once you have that data point, you can plot it and then use the line to predict what absolute zero would be.

Problem: How can the value for absolute zero be determined?
