

Trends in Histology Laboratory Teaching in United States Medical Schools

ROBERT A. BLOODGOOD* AND ROBERT W. OGILVIE

Owing to competition for faculty time among the three major missions of today's academic medical centers, as well as the rapid development of computer-based instructional technologies, laboratory instruction in medical schools in the United States has been undergoing dramatic change. In order to determine recent trends in histology laboratory instruction at U.S. medical schools, a detailed Web survey was administered to histology course directors, with about two-thirds of schools responding. The survey was designed to identify trends in the number of hours of histology laboratory instruction that each medical student receives, the amount of faculty effort devoted to histology laboratory instruction, and the use of various computer-based technologies (including virtual microscopy and virtual slides) in histology laboratory instruction. Consistent with the long-term trend of declining total laboratory teaching hours in U.S. medical schools, there is an ongoing reduction in the number of hours of faculty-directed histology laboratory instruction that each medical student receives, with a concomitant reduction in hours of faculty time devoted to histology laboratory instruction. In terms of the tools used in the histology laboratory, there has been a dramatic increase in the use of various forms of computer-aided instruction (including virtual slides). The large increase in the number of schools using computer-aided instruction has not been accompanied by an equivalent decrease in the number of schools that utilize microscopes and glass slides. Rather, the clear trend has been toward a blending of the new computer-based instructional technologies with the long-standing use of microscopes and glass slides. Anat Rec (Part B: New Anat) 289B:169–175, 2006. © 2006 Wiley-Liss, Inc.

INTRODUCTION

Laboratory teaching in U.S. medical schools has experienced dramatic changes, from its rise in the 1870s (Millcock, 1966) through its peak years in the first half of the 20th century following the release of the Flexner report (Flexner, 1910), to its gradual decline during the past half century (Barzansky, 1992; Genuth et al., 1992; Hoterz, 2003). Gartner (2003) documented a steady decline in laboratory hours in all of the anatomical sciences in U.S. medical schools between 1967 and 2001. For example, between the 1960–1961 academic year and the 1985–1986 academic year, total laboratory teaching hours at the Case Western Reserve University School of Medicine declined from just over 1,000 hr to approximately 350 hr (Genuth et al., 1992). Many factors have probably contributed to the decline of laboratory teaching in U.S. medical schools, including the rise of National Institutes of Health-funded research, managed care, changes in medical practice, reductions in total hours allotted to basic science teaching, and developments in computer-aided instruction. Increased emphasis on patient care and grant-funded basic and clinical research has provided competition for limited faculty resources within medical schools. As Ludmerer (1999) put it, "time spent teaching was incompatible with institutional values that gave priority to research." Especially in the basic sciences, this has led medical schools to develop strategies for teaching medical students that are less faculty-intensive.

Traditionally, one of the major areas of laboratory teaching in the medical curriculum has been histology (also called microanatomy), where the light microscope has been the primary laboratory instructional tool. The rapidly improved sophistication and power of microcomputers has led to the availability of many forms of computer-aided instruction (CAI) in

Dr. Bloodgood is professor of cell biology at the University of Virginia School of Medicine (UVSOM) since 1985, has taught histology to medical students as a faculty member since 1977, and has been course director for the cell and tissue structure course at UVa since 1999. He is cochair of the committee of all first- and second-year course directors at UVSOM and a member of the School of Medicine's Curriculum Committee. His research interests are in the area of cell motility.

Dr. Ogilvie is professor of cell biology and anatomy at the Medical University of South Carolina, where he directs the medical histology and embryology course. He has directed medical histology courses in three medical schools since 1965. He is coeditor, with Jiang Gu, dean of Beijing

College of Medicine, of Virtual Microscopy and Virtual Slides in Teaching, Diagnosis and Research (2005). His research activities over 40 years in academia have included microcirculation of teeth, lung/pulmonary tumors, hyperbaric oxygen treatment, therapeutic effects of exercise, and growth factors on improving circulation to the lower limbs in older persons.
