Defending the Public Domain Paul H. Templet, 2013

When firms externalize environmental costs they appropriate de facto property rights to public natural assets land air and water without compensation to society at large In effect this bestows a large public subsidy on corporations This paper compares the extent of public subsidies in pollution energy and taxes across the 50 U S states and finds that states with higher subsidies generally have worse environmental quality and poorer economic performance These subsidies both reflect and reinforce unequal distributions of political power
