

There are several reasons why an experimentalist is likely to be more successful in the laboratory than in the field. First, the laboratory is a controlled environment. The experimenter can control the variables of the experiment, and can repeat the experiment as many times as needed. Second, the laboratory is a safe environment. The experimenter can avoid the risks of the field, such as weather, terrain, and the behavior of the subjects. Third, the laboratory is a convenient environment. The experimenter can work at his or her own pace, and can avoid the distractions of the field. Finally, the laboratory is a familiar environment. The experimenter is likely to be more comfortable in the laboratory, and this may lead to better results.
