

contributed by the six member states of the European Economic Community, the Community and its members agreed to provide technical assistance to the associated members to ensure "their rapid development".

Although the independence of many French and Belgian colonies in Africa between 1957 and 1962 put the association directly extended to the overseas territories and colonies to serious question, and especially the contentious nature of the concept association, which became subject of very divergent interpretations (Odick, 1989:67) the two sides were able to overcome the challenges of independence by concluding two 'Yaoundé' conventions in 1963 and 1969. These conventions were noted for their very limited impact in stimulating the economic development of the associated states in Africa and the Caribbean Sea. This poor performance of the two 'Yaoundé' conventions to promote the economic, especially the industrial development of the associated states in spite of the fact that they carried forward the three main features of the regime of association namely; reciprocal trade relations between the EEC and it's member states, financial and technical cooperation, which became a prominent reference point in the negotiations of the first Lomé' convention between 1972 and 1973.

Elsewhere we have noted the following in relation to processes that led to the conclusion of the first Lomé' Convention in 1973: "The Utility of the two Yaoundé Convention lies however in the widespread feeling which they aroused amongst Africans of the dangers and effectiveness of exclusive arrangements between African states and their former colonial masters as well as the need to reform the whole structure of relations between Europe and Africa. The opportunity to discuss and resolve some of these issues was not far to seek: the expected accession of the second Yaoundé Agreement in 1974, the renewed interest of the United Kingdom of Great Britain in joining the European Economic Community in 1972 as well as the movement in the United Nations for the Establishment of a new International Economic order combined with the world energy crisis of 1973 to fundamentally strain the status quo in the relation between the European Economic Community and the Associated African States (E.A.S.A.S). The search for a new system of relations therefore opened in 1972" (Odick, 2004:2).

It was with this background that negotiations of the first Lomé' Convention took place mostly in Brussels, but with significant conferences and meetings in different locations. The most significant aspect of the negotiations were the following:

First; the determination of the Nigerian government of the day to ensure that the Lomé' Convention was not a mere reproduction of the 'Yaoundé' Conventions.

Secondly the effort made by the Nigerian government to ensure that instead of African, Caribbean and Pacific groups negotiating separately with Europe, all the future signatories of new agreement confronted the EEC as a unified, coherent group – the African Caribbean and Pacific (ACP) groups of states. This new found unity and solidarity was consolidated in 1975 by the signature of the Georgetown Agreement creating the ACP Group, a new actor in the international system (See Briggs 1978).

Third; in order to offset the less than salutary impact of the two 'Yaoundé' Conventions on the industrial development of the former associated states and territories, the Nigerian government insisted that a special chapter on industrial cooperation be included in Lomé' Convention to stimulate the industrialization of Nigeria.

LOME I TO LOME IV: From multilateral cooperation for development to a system of Political domination? With the passage of time and benefit of hindsight and, with the transition of ACP-EEC multilateral cooperation from Lomé' I to Lomé' IV and the slow motion from the Cotonou Partnership Agreement to regionally negotiated Economic Partnership Agreements EPAs (Odick and Dorris 2012; Watanabe 2004), how can we now describe the Lomé' process? In our considered opinion the whole process of Lomé' from the first to the Fourth Lomé' Convention can best be described as a transition from a system of multilateral economic cooperation between the ACP and the EU in the true sense of the term and mutual agreement to a system of political domination and dictation on the part of the EU and its member states over the ACP countries. Two important variables help to explain this transition: First of all, time and context; and Secondly, the content and subject matter of the four Lomé' Conventions.

In terms of context, most scholars have singled out the period leading up to 1973 as a favorable international context in which the world prices for raw materials and African export commodities were high, the movement for the establishment of a New International Economic Order was at its climax, pitting the Third World countries against the industrialized countries, while OPEC, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries demonstrated beyond doubts by its use of oil as a political weapon that the Third World was a rising force. The international context not only favored the ACP countries, it put pressure on the members of the European Economic Community to make concessions to the ACP countries. It was a pleasant coincidence that Nigeria, a prominent member of OPEC, led and coordinated the negotiations between the ACP and the EEC.

However, the international context declined rapidly after 1973 in such a way that the dialectics between the regionalists and globalists within the global community itself not only sharpened giving rise to questions as to whether the focus on a small group of ACP states was sustainable or consistent with the EEC policy of cooperation for development. But more significantly a new group of political leaders imbued with the zeal of
