

Overview

The book opens with Berger's take on Walter Benjamin's seminal essay "The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction." Berger therefore establishes the Marxist bent of his work, particularly as he parses out the manner in which the ruling class, and a class of scholars which essentially do its bidding, attach an artificial and untruthful aura to original artworks. They do this as a bid to maintain their oppressive and morally superior socioeconomic status, and to renew and maintain the fetishization of original work of art, which the proliferation of photographic reproduction threatens.

The rest of the book is spent analyzing three different genres of visual material: the nude (Chapter Three), oil painting (Chapter Five), and "publicity images," or advertisements (Chapter Seven). Berger's textual chapters alternate with chapters entirely composed of reproductions of works of art or pieces of visual media, including reproductions of oil paintings, editorial photography, and advertisements. Each chapter composed of reproductions seems to serve a thematic aim which matches either the chapter that precedes or proceeds it.

In Chapter Three, Berger carefully dissects the visual codes of the nude, using several oil paintings that demonstrate and reinforce his argument. He judiciously distinguishes the nude, as an art form with its own distinct set of conventions, as entirely different from the human experience of nakedness and lived sexuality. Instead, for him, the nude normalizes the sexist, patriarchal reduction of female humans to the status of sex objects to be used and looked at by men. Through his analysis of the genre's distinct set of conventions, including the mandate to render the nude female body completely free of hair, and the occasional presence of a mirror within the picture frame, in order to condemn a woman for her so-called "vanity," Berger demonstrates the manner in which the visual language of the nude engenders a fundamentally unequal way of seeing women. In turn, this visual language indoctrinates both women and men—but especially women. Under the cultural conditions both created by and responsible for the creation of the nude, the woman internalizes the male gaze and objectifies herself as a manner of survival under patriarchy.

In Chapter Five, Berger undertakes a historicized analysis of the visual codes of oil painting. Charting the manner in which its rise was contemporaneous with the rise of capitalism, Berger ultimately asserts that the central aim of oil painting was to depict the philosophical system of capitalism. Within that philosophical system, the world and all within it is reduced
