Smart Buildings and Technology-enhanced Real Estate Dean Schwanke, 1985 The Incremental Value of Smart Buildings Upon Effective Rents and Transaction Prices Alfredo Keitaro Bando Hano, 2018

Smart buildings have grown from an increase in digital technologies that can sense recognize and verify the experiences of the building and its inhabitants. Nascent literature has identified what it means to be considered smart. Buildings must respond to all three components of systems performance and service and has to have the following components: a Smartness and technology awareness, b economic and cost efficiency, c personal and social sensitivity, and d environmental responsiveness. Yet it is unclear whether these systems have any value to the users or its owners. This thesis studies the economic impact of Smart Connected and Green buildings upon rents and transaction prices. Using numerous data sources, we identify buildings that offer at least one so-called smart amenity and link them with the building's achieved rent and transactions prices as well as to other so-called innovation amenities like greenness and or fiber lit connectivity. Results documented in this study suggest that buildings that offer a more integral solution, i.e. buildings that are Smart Connected and Green, have a premium in both rents and transaction prices over similar office products. While products that offer a more disintegrated solution have a smaller premium or even no incremental value premium, with the exception of green-only buildings that offer a premium by themselves. This study contributes to the vast literature on real estate innovation but explores particularly the recent commercial office products that are Smart Buildings.
