

AGENT-BASED TELEMATIC SERVICES AND TELECOM APPLICATIONS

A TOOLKIT FOR REALIZING RAPID DEVELOPMENT, DEPLOYMENT, AND MANAGEMENT OF AGENT-BASED SYSTEMS AND SERVICES.

The telecommunications market is expanding rapidly and players in that market are facing increasingly stiff competition. The key to commercial success in the telecommunications market will be the provisioning of adequate services, the focus shifting from a purely technological one to one of convenience and usefulness. An important prerequisite is the effective management of basic telecommunications infrastructure supporting the rapid deployment of new services.

These future services will determine the market shares to be gained. Not only must their time to market be reduced, but also other requirements need to be fulfilled, for example, dynamic service development and configuration. Due to a demand for permanent availability the motto to be followed is "information anywhere, anytime." Service maintenance must not interfere with continuous service usage; future services must allow for personalization, meet security demands, and provide management functionality. Furthermore, asynchronous service usage has to be supported as well as demand-driven service combination and integration. Not the least, services must allow for access independent of specific technologies and terminal equipment.

Next to the technical requirements, new business models must be developed reflecting the fact that various actors in new roles, for example, content provider or application service provider, will need to cooperate and coordinate in order to provide these future services. Companies will provide integrated solutions with their own and third-party services being bundled on their platforms. These platforms will realize required infrastructure functionality and enable various means of access by addressing influencing factors and developments of the future telecommunications market such as consumer devices (mobile phones, Internet phones, PDAs), networks (GPRS, UMTS), languages and software technologies (Java, Jini), consumer demands and trends like convenience of use, mobility, and ubiquitous computing. Each role participating in the future telecommunications world will have specific requirements to such service platforms. These demands differ in the extent of infrastructure being needed for service usage and provisioning, according to different necessities regarding aspects such as security, personalization, asynchronous usage, mobility, device-independency, and supporting tools.
