Technology and Science in the Industrializing Nations, 1500-1914 Eric Dorn Brose, 2006 In this revised expanded edition of his critically acclaimed book Eric Dorn Brose weaves a fabric from three histories that until now have been thought of as mutually exclusive The history of technology the history of science and the history of economic development leading to the Industrial Revolution have been written to a very great degree as three histories For decades historians of science and technology agreed with one another that until the 1900s there was little causative interaction between the subjects they studied Moreover economists treated science and technology as residual factors that were important only to the extent that they could be measured Few historians have attempted as Brose does here to demonstrate the relationships among science technology the economy and general political developments Incorporating much new research Professor Brose continues his work of synthesising economic and scientific factors along with the role of social and political institutions The result is an up to date tightly written and concise survey of the history of technology and science over four centuries The narrative starts with the opening of the modern historical epoch around 1500 and ends with the outbreak of World War I in 1914 and covers events in both Europe and the United States Brose constructs his account from the standpoint of technological systems the idea that each epoch evolves a system to meet the material demands of society and the rise and fall of each such system within the period This is a fine introductory overview of the interrelationships among science technology and society in the early modern and modern periods and the impact of each upon the other
