

mix sweets. Perhaps a more critical attitude on the part of the editors would have helped. Still, one should not carp. This book is further evidence of the welcome upsurge of interest in Arabic language and linguistic studies, which in the last fifteen years has seen the launch of an excellent specialist journal in Europe, the Zeitschrift für arabische Linguistik, and the publication, annually, of the "Perspectives on Arabic Linguistics" series of article collections, based on papers presented at the conferences of the American Arabic Linguistics Society.

Among the articles devoted to non-"core" areas in the present collection, I was particularly impressed by Martine Cuvalay's cross-dialectal study of aspectual particles referred to above, Nadia Anghelescu's short paper on the semantics of inchoative verbs in MSA, and Jacques Grand'Henry's useful classification of the different types of social, economic and geographical factors which have tended to favour dialect change in Arabic-speaking areas, backed up with some interesting, if occasionally speculatively re-interpreted examples, both ancient and modern. Of the papers on Arabic grammatical theory and description, I thought the most substantial were Ramzi Baalbaki's excellent study on the differences between the grammarians' and rhetoricians' theories of grammaticality, Tamás Iványi's careful textual analysis of Sibawayhi's system for categorising deviant grammatical structures, Michael Carter's article on the treatment of elision in medieval Arabic grammatical theory, and a thought-provoking piece by Yasir Sulciman on the qaw'id at-ta'wīf ("methodological rules") of the grammarians, exemplified via the analysis of two works of Ibn al-'Anbārī. The half-dozen other studies in the collection on the indigenous Arabic grammatical tradition, however, were all useful.

All in all, this collection of articles contains some excellent contributions to Arabic linguistics in the European and orientalist (I use the word non-pejoratively) tradition, and the contributors generally show a keen awareness of developments in general linguistics which have a relevance to the study of Arabic. The editors are to be congratulated on producing such a painstaking and handsome account of their conference so soon after it was held.

THE COMPOSITION OF MUTANABBĪ'S PANEGYRICS TO SAYF AL-DAWLĀ. By ANDRAS HAMORI. (Studies in Arabic Literature, Vol. XIV.) pp. viii, 127. Leiden etc., E. J. Brill, 1992. Dfl. 65, US $37.14.

Hamori's purpose is "to identify and describe recurrent patterns of composition" in twenty-two of Mutanabbī's panegyrics to Sayf al-Dawla, while making "no attempt...to answer broader questions of historical poetics" (p. vii). His study is thus limited in scope and correspondingly brief; within its limitations, however, it provides a detailed and perceptive analysis of techniques of composition which should put to rest the notion that Arabic poems consist of "Orient pearls at random strung".

The first chapter, on endings, is an appetiser, outlining the basic techniques of closure, many familiar from the works of the Arabic rhetoricians, but some – the use of conditionals, for example – that have escaped their attention. The book's real meat is in chapters 2–4, on the composition of poems incorporating narratives of military campaigns – what Hamori terms the "chronicle form". He proposes a typology of the methods by which the poet moves from the poem's introductory sections to a description of the events it commemorates, noting, for example, the use of verbs of motion to begin a chronicle (a technique used also for initiating smaller segments within a larger passage, as for example in Abū Tammām's qaṣīda on the conquest of Amorium). He notes that transitional passages (e.g. a summary preceding a chronicle) serve at once both to separate and to connect what precedes with what follows (p. 8), and comments on structural and grammatical devices that function as "bridges" between chronicle and non-chronicle segments (pp. 16–17).
