

The DO's and DON'Ts of STUTTERING

DO's

Do slow your own speech down a little when speaking to someone who stutters. This provides a good model and reminder.

Do take pauses and breaths between your sentences. This is another good technique to model for people who stutter to use in their own speech.

Do smile and give eye contact during conversations. This lets your communication partners feel at ease and that they are being listened to.

Do elongate sounds that the child who stutters has trouble saying. For example, if your child would say something like, "I lu-lu-like this one" you could reply, "You llllike this one?" slightly elongating the sound.

Do allow a person who stutters ample opportunity to speak.

Do listen politely and show patience when someone who stutters is speaking.

Do keep background noises and other distractions to a minimum.

Do encourage proper nutrition and rest. Tired children can be more disfluent.

Do contact a trained Speech-Language Pathologist for questions, evaluation, treatment and information about stuttering.

DON'Ts

Don't tell someone who stutters to "slow down" or "relax." This calls attention to you listening to their stutter rather than what they are actually saying and can actually serve to exacerbate the stuttering rather than lessen it.

Don't tell someone who stutters to "just breathe" or "relax." Again, this calls attention to the stuttering, can make a person feel like you are judging their speech, and can actually increase stuttering in that moment.

Don't be distracted and appear too busy to listen thoughtfully during conversation. This can make the other person feel rushed or like he isn't as important as the other things you are doing.

Don't require the child to try the difficult sound/word again after stuttering on a sound within a word.

Don't put a person who stutters in the kind of situation where she or he is competing for a turn to speak.

Don't interrupt someone who stutters.

Don't finish sentences for someone who stutters. Sometimes, people think they are helping by completing a sentence for them, but this does not help and can cause anxiety, frustration, or embarrassment.

Don't expect or demand fluency, even after long periods without stuttering. Stuttering is a lifelong condition that can present in different ways at different times and with varying levels of severity. Changes in life situations can impact fluency.

Don't try at-home remedies that claim to "cure" stuttering.
