Abstract

Introduction One experiences admiration and respect when acknowledging excellence in others. Admiration relates to the person's superior abilities, whereas respect focuses on the person as a whole. Although previous studies suggest a link between admiration/respect and motivation, it is unclear as to whether these emotions enhance task performance. We investigated the relationship between admiration/respect and task performance.

Method Forty-two Japanese participants completed an English exam, watched a video, and completed a second exam. In the video, an interviewer asked an English lecturer to provide tips for completing the exam. After the second exam, participants rated the amount of admiration and respect they had for the lecturer and interviewer. We examined whether experiencing admiration/respect enhanced exam scores.

Results We found that experiencing admiration had no significant effect on exam scores. However, the participants who had stronger respect for the lecturer improved their score ($p < 0.001$) whereas the score of the other participants did not differ between exams ($p = 0.504$). Moreover, the analysis showed a positive correlation between score increment and the amount of awe, a subcategory of the Japanese concept of respect ($p = 0.014$).

Conclusion The results suggest that respect (particularly awe), rather than admiration, is involved in performance improvement.

1 Introduction

Admiration and respect are positive social emotions experienced when we recognize excellence in others [1–11]. Admiration focuses on outstanding or moral behaviors [1, 12, 13], while respect focuses on the person as a whole based on those behaviors [2]. Although these emotions are similar, there are some differences between them. Previous studies have reported that admiration and respect as concepts are clustered differently based on similarity ratings of Japanese synonyms for admiration and respect [3, 6]. In addition, Nakatani, et al., [11] found that the experiences of admiration and respect activated different locations within the anterior temporal lobe. These results suggest that admiration and respect are experienced distinctly and have separate neural bases.

According to previous studies, admiration and respect play a significant role in enhancing motivation [1, 2, 9, 14]. Admiration for virtue (also called elevation) enhances moral and prosocial behaviors, while admiration for superior
