

Columbus in the Caribbean

Columbus was certain he would reach Japan after 33 days (about 1 month) at sea. The maps and measurements he had studied, including one of the earliest known globes, suggested to him that Asia could be no more than 3,000 miles (about 4828.03 km) away from Europe on an almost straight course. His ships the Niña, Pinta, and Santa Maria left the Spanish port of Palos de la Frontera on August 3, 1492, and arrived in the Bahamas 65 days (about 2 months) later October 12, 1492. The exact location of the explorer's first landfall stays a topic of some debate, but Columbus claimed the land in the name of the Spanish crown and named the island San Salvador—"Our Savior"—in honor of Jesus Christ. As Columbus and his crew came ashore, they were met by Arawak-speaking Tanios, whom Columbus—thinking he had reached India—labeled "Indians."

Historians have long scrutinized accounts of the first contacts between Columbus's crew and native peoples and have produced many interpretations of the circumstances as well as the consequences. Over the next century, the increasing pace of European occupation of various parts of the New World led to further "first encounters." The nature of the first encounters between Europeans and societies throughout the New World presents challenging questions of perspectives, motives, and roles.
