Background

Learning is the core purpose of schools. These days: "If you can't learn, unlearn and relearn, you're lost because sustainable and continuous learning is a given of the twenty-first century"¹. Every young person must be able to seize learning opportunities throughout life, to broaden her or his knowledge, skills and attitudes, and adapt to an increasingly changing, complex and interdependent world². It isn't surprising that learning to learn has been described as the key skill of the century³.

For most schools, this is a new agenda demanding significant change and continuous learning of teachers. Teachers are told they need to be 'informed professionals'⁴. To achieve this, they need to work together in professional learning communities (PLCs) within and between schools⁵, building the capacity of their schools and generating new knowledge that will help enhance learning for all of their students.

Promoting new kinds of learning fundamentally depends on creativity. Lucas⁶ describes creativity as:

... a state of mind in which all of our intelligences are working together. It involves seeing, thinking and innovating. Creativity can be demonstrated in any subject at school or any aspect of life. Creative people question the assumptions they are given. They see the world differently, are happy to experiment, to take risks and to make mistakes.

By contrast, 'informed prescription'⁷ in current initial teacher training and national improvement strategies in England can lead to dependency⁸ and lack of creativity – "just show me what to do".

The status quo is a very compelling state. So what might help promote the creativity needed for schools to be successful and children to achieve? We believe that this is a
