

Dr Suzy Hodgson - Manukau Institute of Technology- Te Pūkenga, Auckland, New Zealand

Studies have shown that parental leave policy alone does not enable all fathers to co-parent their children, with deeper socio-cultural and structural barriers (e.g. gender inequality) that include traditional views on masculinity (i.e. and gendered norms regarding whose job it is to care for children) (p. 10).

Interviews generally began by asking the participants to tell their story of becoming a father for the first time. Follow up questions sought to understand their preparations for becoming a father, experiences in the workplace, and any other topics participants highlighted as being important.

Twelve new fathers shared their experiences in this study, six aged 25–34 and six 35–44. Eleven identified as "White/British" and one as "White/Other". All lived with their partners; six married and six co-habiting. Eleven fathers had a baby under one year and one had a child under two years.

Theoretical sampling and constant comparison procedures (i.e., line by line coding, focused coding and theoretical coding) led to the iterative formulation of the theoretical categories and final core category (i.e., GGTM typically seeks transferability rather than generalisability) (p. 16). Hence the findings of this study may be applicable to many different contexts or even policies to improve the lives of young people.

"It was scary, possibly the most scary experience that I've ever been through—especially looking back now, it was so close to losing both of them."

"So, I'll go home then at four o'clock in the morning, and I think all that happened so quick and then you're almost left on your own to deal with it really...and then to see the sights that you've seen and the emotions that flood through."

"It was just mainly running around, just doing whatever I could to try and make things a bit easier. I don't think there was much fathering there, as much as there was husbanding. It was very much supportive...trying to predict what Louise might need!"

"Everything got on top of me, I had to go back to work and leave a baby crying...I can't just not go to work, as much as I'd love to stay here and help you, I can't, because I'm only allowed two weeks, that's all you're allowed...I felt like I was abandoning my duties...and you feel so guilty but what can you do?"

"I remember... crying on the bus on the first day, I remember falling asleep on the bus in those first few weeks back at work, a number of times. So a combination of just being sleep-deprived and really not wanting to be there when I was at work, I felt pretty rotten, definitely for the first few weeks back at work."

"I'd not really thought about coming back to work and kind of knowing that I will miss a big chunk of his life. Because I am at work, I'm out of the house most of the day... in this what it will be like for me, not forever, but for the long-term future... I'm out of his life for more time than I'm actually in it."

Joan

"I dunno, losing a little bit of that identity about you know I'm kind of kind of known at work as the film buff and someone to talk to about those things and that is kind of slowly going and people are saying, oh have you seen this film [name] and I'm like, what's that?"

"Don't know if that's just me with anxiety, or whether that's more normal... what everyone goes through. It's hard to tell. Cos... a lot of blockers keep their feelings to themselves. It's very rare that you get the truth about what blockers are feeling, cos they like to put up a wall, as protection for themselves."

Fathers in this study both explicitly and implicitly described distress on their return to work and self-indicated a change in their values relating with their work environment but not necessarily in the workplace. When returning to work at this time in the postnatal period are vulnerable to experiencing distress and that flexibility and support in the workplace could be protective of their mental health.

According to the literature, the most commonly used methods for determining the optimal number of clusters for the most results are visualization methods, such as silhouette analysis, the gap statistic, the elbow method, and the average linkage method. However, these methods are not always reliable, and they can be affected by the choice of the distance metric and the linkage method. In this study, we used the silhouette analysis method to determine the optimal number of clusters. The silhouette analysis method is a robust method for determining the optimal number of clusters, and it is not affected by the choice of the distance metric and the linkage method.
