Shape and Size are considered concurrently for spatial relevance. A space, irrespective of the size, can have many different shapes.

The SIZE relates to the human body, and reflects the work capacities and duration required for domesticating a space. Sizes, as abstract entities, offer scaling, proportions, analogy, sequencing, proximity, etc. Size of a space is perceived for ergonomic facilitation, anthropometric adequacy, tasks conduction, social interaction, degree of distancing for social interaction, intimacy and privacy, security, cognition, physical and cognitive reach, communication and expression.

The SHAPES have primary identity relating to the gravity, like vertical, horizontal or inclination, but also directional peculiarities due to the differential sizes. Size is perceived as the difference between the Length and Width of a space. The height (gravity) confers its own scale of narrowness or broadness to the space. Height accentuates or de-emphasizes the character of the space nominally contributed by the relation between the Length and the Width. The orientation of smaller or larger size gives a feel of a deep and shallow space. All these terms also give a sense of direction (long vs short) in the space.

A space is considered small (narrow), if one of its horizontal-spread dimensions (either L or W) is proportionately smaller. The orientation of smaller or larger size gives a feel of a deep and shallow space. The terms (L W H) give a sense of direction in the space.

- Tall, is a height identity and Deep is frontal distance distinction.
- Narrow spaces have one of the floor dimensions (width or length) proportionately smaller. Spaces with a strong linear (directional) character seems narrower. Taller spaces seem narrower compared to a shallow (low height) space with the same floor spread.
- A wide space is very ambiguous a term. All large sized spaces are also wide spaces, because here both the dimensions are functionally more than adequate.
