

GEOGRAPHY, HISTORY, AND THE CITY IN EUROPE AND RUSSIA

JAMES H. BATER, St. Petersburg: Industrialization and Change, Studies in Urban History 4. Montreal: McGill-Queens University Press, 1976. Pp. 469.

The unity of geography and history was long accepted by historians. Geography was both the theatre of history and its ground. It was space conjoined with time, land with men and events. In Europe, this tradition was vigorously and creatively restated during the first half of the twentieth century. In the United States, during the same period, there was a parting of the ways of geography and history, a schism that is well known, although its explanation has never been clear. Geography became suspect to the American historian. He came to "glimpse the fields and gardens"¹ of this neighboring discipline, with its foliage of specializations far more dense than his own, and questioned the nature and importance of the geographer's work. For the Philistine, it was a rudimentary topic studied in grammar school; for the rest, the "relative lack of study of the relations between Geography and History" that Frederick Jackson Turner noted at an American Historical Association conference of 1907 devoted to that topic, and the highly skeptical conclusions that the same conference reached about the importance of geography for historical study, are facts that apply to most American historians seventy years later.²

Recently, they have been called upon to reconsider geography. This current encounter of the two disciplines may be seen largely as a by-product of the erosion since the 1960s of traditional historical method and the growing acceptance of new approaches to history emanating from the social sciences and from European as well as American
