

► US government, combined with the mounting security investigation into his background, was what prompted him to flee. The timing is persuasive: the day the news of the suit reached Europe, Pontecorvo set his plans for defection in motion.

Turchetti is critical of contemporaneous media accounts and later books that allege Pontecorvo was a spy; some are based on recollections of former agents of the Soviet security service. Decades on, there is no firm evidence to support the allegation.

What did Pontecorvo offer the Soviet atomic weapons programme? Here Turchetti speculates, based on what is known. After his defection, Pontecorvo worked at the Dubna Institute for Nuclear Research near Moscow (now the Joint Institute for Nuclear Research) — ostensibly only on civil nuclear science. Turchetti argues that, in reality, his expertise would have allowed him to make important contributions to the Soviet atomic bomb without necessarily working on secret projects. In particular, Pontecorvo's geophysical expertise may have helped the Soviet Union to gain access to uranium reserves, which were in short supply in the 1950s.

Today, neither the Russian archives nor those of the US Federal Bureau of Investigation on Pontecorvo are open. Such secrecy tells us much about those times and about the post-cold-war mindsets on both sides of the fence, which remain riddled with paranoia. The allegations of espionage levied in 1999 against Wen Ho Lee, a Taiwanese-US scientist working at Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico, demonstrate how those fears continue to guide, and misguide, investigations of such claims.

Wen Ho Lee was exonerated of espionage. Pontecorvo — who died in Russia in 1993, deeply disillusioned with communism — remains in posthumous limbo.

One thing is clear. If Pontecorvo was not a spy, and his defection was based simply on fear of persecution and a preference for life under communism, he made a poor choice. In the West during the cold war, scientists lost their jobs amid witch-hunts, but in the Soviet Union, at least under Joseph Stalin, the outcomes were more dire. Nothing in the book illustrates this better than Stalin's comment on a proposed conference organized by nuclear physicists: "Leave them in peace, we can shoot them later." ■

MUSEUM

Stripped assets

Paolo Mazzarello argues that the disposal of collections requires clear consultation with the public.

Museums are facing a sort of Malthusian constraint — an explosive increase in the volume of their collections, coupled with a severe reduction in funding, fuelled partly by the current economic crisis. Collections cannot be increased indefinitely and sustained forever. So what happens when a saturation point is reached?

The Museum of Natural History at the University of Pavia in Italy is an example of how things can go wrong at such a tipping point. Founded by naturalist Lazzaro Spallanzani in the eighteenth century, the museum was dismantled in the 1930s in the face of financial and other pressures. The collection — including some of the first animal specimens preserved by taxidermy — was then dispersed across a number of sites in Pavia and the surrounding area.

This was an extreme solution, but museums must evolve. The goal of museums, to safeguard the evidence of important changes in the history of the planet and humankind, is an endless task. In response, they must be dynamic places, where the acquisition of objects is balanced by the planned deaccession or disposal of others.

Such an activity is at odds with the fasty image of a museum as a place where items are preserved in display cases or kept in storage. However, the disposal of materials demands care: whether justifiable or not, it is often highly controversial and can devastate an institution's image. From small civic archives to the vast Prado in Madrid, museums are the repositories of our collective past and identity, and that makes any broad discussion of disposal problematic.

Careful accession and deaccession policies are becoming increasingly important
