

Student Unrest in Nigerian Universities

Raymond O.A. Aluede*
Oyasiwo Aluede

Abstract

This paper presents the factors that precipitate student unrest in Nigerian universities, which are: non-participation in decision-making, academic stress, welfare problems, changing value systems of students, contemporary national issues and teacher influence. It provides some possible management strategies that could be adopted to reduce the incidents of student unrest in Nigerian universities.

The authors conclude by advocating the localisation of admissions, that is to say, university admissions policy should be restricted to attracting potential students only from the local environment wherein a university is situated. This the authors hope will minimise the incessant occurrence of student unrest in Nigerian university campuses.

Students' militancy on the campuses has come to be recognised in tertiary institutions in Nigeria, and other countries of the world as one of the most visible personal problems of significance. So much so that it seems appropriate to think that there is fast emerging among students on Nigerian university campuses a culture of violence (Nwankwale 1992).

In Nigeria, therefore, if there is anything predictable about her students, it is the fact that they would riot in any given academic session. As a remedy, this has often led the university authorities and/or government to close down such institutions in the wake of any student demonstration. Such incessant closures have often affected the smooth running of these institutions, the quality of students and degrees turned out by these institutions. Thus, people now wonder whether Nigerian students learn anything in their campuses apart from engaging themselves in campus unrest.

In the light of the prevailing background, following questions are examined here:

- What are the possible causes of student unrest in Nigerian university campuses?
