

Navy and Marine Corps have recently maintained highly rated aircraft units often using each other to produce the best and most to produce the and fuselage camouflage style colours. It would be a Light Gulf Grey (FS 36460) centred around the standard surfaces although gloss as a standard undersurface for many years on US Navy however, the USN began implementing new camouflage schemes in line fleet similar to those of USAF. The F-14 Tomcat's official scheme of dark S 36237 over the top medium grey (FS 36320) of the fuselage and fins, while a similar applied to the F-4J A-7E Corsairs. Markings the bright colours national insignia is in deterioration is one of the biggest problems of these matt or lustreless colours and such is the exposure of these schemes to the elements that it is often difficult to determine where the colours change. To prevent unnecessary scuffing and the surfaces maintenance crews are encouraged to wear protective footwear.

Although possessing no carriers, the German Bundesmarine provides NATO with an extra combat force, its Tornado strike and Atlantic patrol aircraft being assigned to cover the Baltic and its environs. Standard Bundesmarine colours for these two aircraft and the Sea King and Lynx helicopters in use are Basalt Grey (RAL7012) over the top surfaces and Light Grey (RAL7035) on the under-surfaces.

Below: A new disruptive camouflage pattern of light and dark greys on a German Navy Tornado of MFG-1.

Bundesmarine Tornado

Basalt Grey and Light Grey were the colours worn by German Navy Tornados.

The main tasks of Bundesmarine Tornados are low-level anti-shipping operations in the Baltic.
