

The National Supported Work Demonstration (NSW) was a temporary labor training program that aimed to help disadvantaged workers move into the labor market during the 1970s.

A group of researchers want to determine whether people who attended the NSW training program had a higher one-year-later income, on average, than those who did not attend. They collect income data from a sample of NSW program participants as well as from a comparable sample of people who did not participate. The results are summarized in the table below.

| Group               | n   | Sample Mean | Sample Std. Deviation |
|---------------------|-----|-------------|-----------------------|
| 1. NSW participants | 554 | 6647        | 7294                  |
| 2. non-participants | 616 | 6422        | 7016                  |
