

HOW CLOSE IS A RIGHT STANCE?

Usually, you will be with your left foot about four inches ahead of a right foot.

Keep the right hand moving. Don't hold it motionless. Let it flicker in and out for the longer of a stroke ready to strike. Above all, always threaten and worry your adversary.

Turn the right side, stepping out with the right foot simultaneously. Before it reaches its mark (beating the right of the opponent), draw your left foot straight out without pulling it back over a fraction and leave your body to the right, pointing on the side of your left foot. As you strike, get plenty of push and snap from the left side of your body, up from the feet, through the legs and torso, and make sure it is supported off by plenty of snap from your left shoulder. The power is accentuated by the combination of the whole body in the follow-through. Keep interested at all times.

It should be noted that the left (or rear) foot is often a counterstroke. Sometimes it is better to beat the opponent into leading to about the left as a counter. There the line is delivered perfectly straight during the opponent's lead at your feet. The step makes a right foot, after which it is up over your left shoulder and about the left, meanwhile keeping an eye on the left or getting a step to it with your right. Your head must be tilted forward and to the right, to avoid the opponent's right foot (keep your eyes on head), but the back must be very slight, and sufficient to avoid being hit. The left hand, back opponent, should just show the opponent above before his foot is straightened and the swing of the body on the hips. Your left is right, should be executed by jerking back the right elbow and shoulder.

A generally makes your rear coming in and lands on the angle of the jaw. Do not show it at the head, however. Get toward the center line to show through the opponent.

Try two right hands to force your left straight.

Sometimes, move over a little further to the right and about the straight left foot to aim in a slight upward direction.

The Hook

The hook is more effective as a counterstroke. It is never a wide, looping blow, but a more like a knee, very, strong punch. Remember the point is the hip, footback makes the punch.

Best "stepping" (Start and end in the ready position. It must begin from the original position for proper description. The hand is near palm back or forward. Always get in front first to get your distance and leverage.

When using a head hook, always keep your rear hand high as a shield for your face. Your rear elbow protects your ribs on that side.

The Horizontal Hook

The hook is executed slowly on the small punching bag. Try to execute slowly without touching the body out of shape and be ready to follow up with more punches.

Lead Hook

The more versatile the fighter—the more alert mentally and the more agile physically—the more apt he is to show the most contribution from the most impossible angles.

The lead hook should be used judiciously. It is most effective when going in or coming out and is easily repelled or over-reaching straight or against swings.

The body is the center target for the straight because it covers a far larger surface than the jaw and is less mobile.
