Abstract The immune system is a complex network of cells, tissues and organs that defend the body against infection and disease.

The immune system is a complex network of cells, tissues and organs that defend the body against infection and disease. It is composed of a variety of cell types, including T cells, B cells, natural killer (NK) cells, dendritic cells, macrophages, neutrophils, mast cells, and natural killer T (NKT) cells. These cells are distributed throughout the body, including the blood, lymphatic system, skin, mucosal surfaces, and internal organs. They work together to identify and eliminate foreign invaders, such as bacteria, viruses, and fungi. The immune system also plays a role in maintaining homeostasis and preventing autoimmune diseases.

The immune system is composed of two main branches: the innate immune system and the adaptive immune system. The innate immune system is the first line of defense, providing a rapid response to infection. It includes physical barriers, such as the skin and mucosal surfaces, and non-specific cellular mechanisms, such as phagocytosis and natural killer cells.

The adaptive immune system is more specific and targeted, responding to specific antigens. It includes T cells, B cells, and antibodies. T cells can recognize specific antigens and activate other cells to fight infection. B cells produce antibodies that bind to specific antigens and prevent them from causing harm.

The immune system is a complex and dynamic system that requires a delicate balance between different cell types and mechanisms. It is constantly adapting to new challenges and threats, ensuring the health and well-being of the body.
