Artists, Cosmopolitanism, and the Civic Imagination Maria Rovisco, 2025-02-17

Artists Cosmopolitanism and the Civic Imagination unpacks the political agency of artists by looking at artists as moral reflexive and political agents Do artists play a role in civil society Can artists make a difference in the world In what ways do artists act politically To address these questions this book moves away from a focus on social organisation and the production of art to ask how artists attach meaning to their interventions in social and political conditions Maria Rovisco draws from in depth interviews with UK based visual artists and theatre practitioners with a migrant background and semiotic analysis of a theatre play visual artworks and film texts to argue that artists are quintessential cosmopolitans who care deeply about changing society for the better By explaining how artists get involved in cross cultural encounters this book reveals the processes of listening reflection imagination social learning and moral intentionality through which artists imagine and realise their visions of a better world In so doing it offers a new direction in thinking about the intersection of art and politics by showing how artists play a crucial role in building a civic culture outside traditional sites of political participation This book will be essential reading for students and scholars across the social sciences and the humanities with interests in migration citizenship and the public sphere cultural sociology media and culture cosmopolitanism and art
