Academic work is often seen as producing written text as the result of intensive thought. The text is readily assessable and available for analysis, so it is not surprising that there are a range of EAP writing and reading courses available. However, academics and students face other demands in the current growth of the international education marketplace.

The demands of speaking in an academic setting are many, with oracy in English playing an important role in content learning and the expression of ideas (Van Ments, 1990). Oral skills are necessary in many professional and academic situations which ESOL students aspire to or are involved in (Murphy, 1991). Yet there is a paucity of teaching material for speaking skills in an academic setting. Study Speaking addresses this need with a course in spoken English for academic purposes.

The course consists of a text which integrates teacher and learner material and a tape which includes listening material and sample performances. The text is organised into three sections. The first section of student's materials covers eight thematically organised units. The second section of resource materials includes extension suggestions, some brief supplementary material and transcripts of listening tasks. The final section in the book is entitled "Teacher's Guide". This includes text of sampled speaking and detailed teacher's notes which draw on current research into oracy tasks and learner-centred talk.

The authors show their experience of ESOL learners in an academic setting through their choice of a needs-based thematic organisation. The themes such as starting a course, university systems, accommodation and obtaining medical treatment are
