The Following of the Star

Florence Louisa Barclay,2020-09-28 David Rivers closed his Bible suddenly slipped it into the inner pocket of his coat and leaning back in his armchair relaxed the tension at which he had been sitting while he mentally put his thoughts into terse and forcible phraseology. His evening sermon was ready. The final sentence had silently thrilled into the quiet study in the very words in which it would presently resound through the half empty little village church and David felt as did the young David of old when he had paused at the brook and chosen five smooth stones for his sling on his way to meet the mighty champion of the Philistines. David now felt ready to go forward and fight the Goliath of apathy and inattention the life long habit of not listening to the voice of the preacher or giving any heed to the message he brought. The congregation in this little Hampshire village church where during the last five weeks David had acted as locum tenens consisted entirely of well to do farmers and their families of labourers who lounged into church from force of habit or because since the public houses had been closed by law during the hours of divine service it was the only warmed and lighted place to be found on a Sunday evening of a few devout old men and women to whom weekly church going while on earth appeared the only possible preparation for an eternity of Sabbaths in the world to come and of a fair sprinkling of village lads and lassies who took more interest in themselves and in each other than in the divine worship in which they were supposed to be taking part. The two churchwardens stout florid and well to do occupied front pews on either side of the centre. Mr Churchwarden Jones on the right Mr Churchwarden Smith on the left. Their official position lent them a dignity which they enjoyed to the full and which overflowed to Mrs Jones and Mrs Smith seated in state beside them. When on collection Sundays the churchwardens advanced up the chancel together during the final verse of the hymn and handed the plates to the Rector their wives experienced a sensation of pride in them which custom could not stale. They were wont to describe at the Sunday midday dinner or at supper afterwards the exact effect of this procession up the church an oft told tale for which they could always be sure of at least one interested auditor.
