
Frosty day. The snow. Caroline with her new wax skates.

He poked several other small round holes in the ice with the end of his pole, and then, feeling it cold and uncomfortable standing on the pier, he went back to the house and reported to Mallerville the result of his examination.

The cold wind continued all day, but it went down in the evening at sunset, and the air became calm. The next morning the ice was perfectly solid and firm, and as the air was calm and the sky serene, the circumstances were in all respects favorable for skating and sliding on the river. Several boys from the village came to skate and to slide. One of them brought his sister with him, whose name was Caroline. Caroline proposed that Mallerville should go down with her to the shore, and see the boys skate. Caroline was much older than Mallerville, and said that she would take care of her.

Caroline was a very courageous girl, and Mallerville felt quite safe under her guidance. Wallace had gone down some minutes before, with his skates in his hand. Caroline and Mallerville went to the bridge which leads across the beach just above its mouth. This bridge is not in sight in the frontispiece view, being concealed by the trees and shrubbery on the point
