Time: Originally, the main purpose of chimes was to add the sound of church bells. Its time is very similar to the way you teach the Mallet Percussion Instruments.

Range: The range of the chimes is usually 1½ octaves. The entire range of the chimes is Chimes are a non-transposing instrument and sound at the written pitch.

Weight Questions: Chimes consist of a rack upon which are suspended tubes made of a relatively hard brass-steel alloy. The tubes are made in either 1, 1½ or 2½ inch diameters. As the size (weight) of the chime is directly related to the amount of steel in the tube, the larger the diameter, the greater the total weight and carrying power. Most chimes made today are equipped with a damper pedal similar to the one found on the xylophone. The action of the pedal differs with different manufacturers, some damp when the pedal is down and others when the pedal is up.

Mallets: Chime mallets are usually made from tightly rolled layers with a wooden handle. A wooden mallet can also be used in, for a more subdued tone, a wooden mallet with leather around ends. The chime mallet's shape is somewhat different than the mallets used on the rest of the mallet percussion instruments and looks like a hammer. Do not use metal mallets on the chimes unless they are specifically requested in the part, as they tend to damage the tubes and are not consistent with the best tone quality of the instrument.

Care: The chimes should be covered when not in use. The single most important part of the chimes which should be checked regularly is the suspension cords. They should be replaced at the first sign of wear or you may find your chimes falling off the rack in the middle of a concert. The damper pedal should be checked periodically to be sure it is operating with the minimum of foot action. Be sure that the rack is strong and secure at all times, but especially after moving the instrument, as it must support a considerable amount of weight.
