An experiment is used to check the effect of an ad featuring famous people. Test subjects were shown either former US President Bill Clinton or actor George Clooney appealing to viewers to donate money for Darfur. The researcher wants to know if the opinion that the respondents taking part in the experiment have of these people leads to more frequent donations.

Use the data file Clooney and Clinton.sav for the following exercises.

A few tips before you start:

- Before you analyse the data, first always check the variables for possible values that need to be set to missing.
- Create a syntax for all relevant analyses and include comments (a note) in your syntax

You can use the formula sheet when necessary.

Part 1: Scale construction

The researcher asked the test subjects what they think about Clinton and Clooney. One of the latent variables she expects to measure is 'attractiveness'.

1. Run an exploratory factor analysis with the variables 'sympathetic', 'stylish', 'attractive', 'elegant', 'sexy' and 'nice'. These variables are measured at interval level. How many factors are formed and how can you tell? Reverse code variables with negative factor loadings (please note that reverse coding is necessary for determining reliability, not validity. On the exam we will not provide this information).
2. What is the explained variance of the factor(s) and what does that mean?
3. Find out whether you can make a reliable scale(s) for these factor(s) and whether the scale(s) can be improved.
4. Compose a mean scale(s) and indicate the most suitable measure of central tendency and measure of dispersion. Also provide your interpretation of these measures.

Another latent variable that the researcher thinks to measure is 'credibility'.

5. Run an exploratory factor analysis with the variables 'honest', 'reliable', 'sincere', 'integrity', 'trust', 'cooperation' and 'prestige'. These variables are measured at interval level. How many factors
