Rosensweig reminds us that American exports to emerging nations have tripled since 1986. He projects that by the year 2010 the world will contain six great regional economies four of them in Asia and that three of every eight middle class consumers will reside in the developing world. In clear nontechnical language he explains how executives can identify trends of globalization and apply them to business strategy particularly to what he calls a time phased global strategy for synchronizing a firm's investments with the progress of emerging middle classes. Winning the Global Game demonstrates that adopting a global perspective now is a win-win strategy that links people and profits. It will be important reading for all multinational executives and managers in firms which are going global. The chapter on 21st century personal career strategy will appeal particularly to the aspiring global executive.
