Viele, 1989 Dickey-Lincoln School Lakes Transmission Project (ME, NH, VT), 1978 Southern Appalachian Regional Seismic Network, 1994 The seismic activity in the southern Appalachian area was monitored by the Southern Appalachian Regional Seismic Network SARSN since late 1979 by the Center for Earthquake Research and Information CERI at Memphis State University This network provides good spatial coverage for earthquake locations especially in east Tennessee The level of activity concentrates more heavily in the Valley and Ridge province of eastern Tennessee as opposed to the Blue Ridge or Inner Piedmont The large majority of these events lie between New York Alabama lineament and the Clingman Ocoee lineament magnetic anomalies produced by deep seated basement structures Therefore SARSN even with its wide station spacing has been able to define the essential first order seismological characteristics of the Southern Appalachian seismic zone The focal depths of the southeastern U S earthquakes concentrate between 8 and 16 km occurring principally beneath the Appalachian overthrust In cross sectional views the average seismicity is shallower to the east beneath the Blue Ridge and Piedmont provinces and deeper to the west beneath the Valley and Ridge and the North American craton Results of recent focal mechanism studies by using the CERI digital earthquake catalog between October 1986 and December 1991 indicate that the basement of the Valley and Ridge province is under a horizontal NE SW compressive stress Right lateral strike slip faulting on nearly north south fault planes is preferred because it agrees with the trend of the regional magnetic anomaly pattern List of U.S. Geological Survey Geologic and Water-supply Reports and Maps for Pennsylvania and New Jersey, 1988 Glaciotectonism James S.
