1. Introduction

Energy makes possible the investments and innovation that generate jobs, inclusive growth and shared prosperity for entire economies. Fossil fuels are the main source of energy across the globe and thus the energy sector is a major contributor to climate change, responsible for two-thirds of greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions. Currently, the sector is witnessing a major transformation, with renewable energy playing an increasingly vital role in helping countries develop modern and resilient energy systems. Given the global imperative to address climate change, there is a need to both broaden the base of existing energy taxes to cover all fossil fuel use and to rationalize energy tax rates to fully internalize those fuels' environmental costs. There is also often scope for significant fiscal savings (and environmental protection) from eliminating pre-tax subsidies and tax expenditures that promote fossil fuel consumption.

This note provides guidance on how to assess a country's current level of energy taxation and formulate a policy framework for its rationalization and expansion. Section 2 provides an overview of global energy taxes, including a description of the various instruments used, their revenue raising capabilities, and how external costs are included in their formulation. Section 3 discusses policy considerations for achieving an efficient level of energy taxes such as the choice of tax base and rates, revenue potentials, and other major policy concerns. Section 4 summarizes key policy advice and Annex I provides a distributional analysis of energy taxes.

2. Overview

Source: OECD Piae Database

Energy taxes, which comprise fuel excise taxes as well as carbon and electricity consumption taxes<sup>2</sup>, are the largest source of environmental tax revenue worldwide. Among OECD countries, energy taxes on average account for 72% of total environmental revenues. By contrast, among non-OECD countries, some of which generate significant revenue from natural resource taxes, energy taxes account for an average of 52 percent of environmental tax revenues (Figure 1). The share of energy taxes in environmental revenues is also more variable in the developing world. Among OECD countries, the share of energy taxes ranges from about 50 percent for countries such as Iceland and New Zealand to more than 90% for countries such as Poland

<sup>2</sup> This paper is part of a World Bank project, led by Miria Pigato (Lead economist) on "Securing a Sustainable Recovery: A Guide to Green Taxes and Spending", under the supervision of Chiara Bronchi (practice manager) and Marcello Estevao (Global Director) in the Macroeconomics, Trade and Investment Global Practice of the World Bank. The project includes seven technical Notes in response to a growing demand from client countries for insights on green spending policies and tax instruments to help support a sustainable recovery from the Covid-19 induced recession. Financial support from the Just-in Time COVID 19 Support Window for DPPs is gratefully acknowledged.
