

Robert J. Silverman is associate professor of education at Ohio State University and editor of the Journal of Higher Education.

Discussion of the manifest and latent roles of various categories of educator are frequently presented in both the formal and informal communication channels which serve the educational field.

Role behaviors, types of role conflict, and theoretically derived constructs, such as "local-cosmopolitan," are empirically connected through various dependent variables, such as innovation, to the mental health of the practitioner type in question. Curiously, a pivotal role category, which has both intrinsic research and applied educational significance, has received virtually no attention either in the educational or social science literature—journal editors who serve the various fields of study and action.

The purpose of this article is to discuss the editor as creator of the future. While the author has elsewhere concentrated on the role conduct of education journal editors,¹ this discussion addresses the commitments held and the influence editors desire: the content of their ideas concerning the future, and the relationship between these notions and the directions to be taken by their publications.

Few will dispute that editors perform educational functions regardless of the field served. They not only accept or reject manuscripts, at times based on a system of peer review, and thus promote certain topical concerns, but they frequently invite papers with specific orientations. It is often noted in the futurist literature that "the formulation, as well as the act of describing the image of the future, may influence the future itself."² Although there is competition to editors' influence, historically editors in education, such as Horace Mann and Thomas Bicknell,³ have used their media to influence directions. However, publication of articles attending to various topics, the rewarding of those who are published, and the editorial advice offered to unsuccessful authors who are excluded from full colleagueship, are but the most obvious forms of influence.

More subtly, editors assume covert roles—social when relating the institution of education to the larger system, methodological when demanding knowledge generation according to certain patterns, scholarly when prioritizing content and process items in the selection of manuscripts, and organizational when relating to the publisher as well as to colleagues.

In brief, editors through explicit policies and implicit interests provide models which identify and reinforce, by their very existence, images of the desirable.

THE FUTURE AS AN OBJECT OF STUDY

Recent years have witnessed an explosion both in professional activities and in the literature which address the future. If massive annotated bibliographies and abstracts⁴ are indicators of a field's arrival, then certainly "futurism" is with us. Although some desire to escape the present, most who contribute to these activities and writings perceive a need for predicting and subsequently planning for the changes which are inevitable.

For the purposes of this article, it is unnecessary to explore this literature in detail. In addition to the ubiquitous listings of anticipated futures pertaining to various social institutions, there are heuristic models and metamodels which allow for synoptic approaches to future thinking. Some of these notions will be addressed when we examine editors' beliefs.

The Education of Black People W. E. B. DuBois, 2001-06

Undoubtedly the most influential black intellectual of the twentieth century and one of America's finest historians W E B DuBois knew that the liberation of the African American people required liberal education and not vocational training He saw education as a process of teaching certain timeless values moderation an avoidance of luxury a concern for courtesy a capacity to endure a nurturing love for beauty At the same time DuBois saw education as fundamentally subversive This was as much a function of the well established role of education from Plato forward as the realities of the social order under which he lived He insistently calls for great energy and initiative for African Americans controlling their own lives and for continued experimentation and innovation while keeping education's fundamentally radical nature in view Though containing speeches written nearly one hundred years ago and on a subject that has seen more stormy debate and demagoguery than almost any other in recent history The Education of Black People approaches education with a timelessness and timeliness at once rooted in classical thought that reflects a remarkably fresh and contemporary relevance
