

A TALK BY COLONEL INSOO KIM

SOUTH KOREA'S DEFENSE STRATEGY AND THE DILEMMA OF ALLIANCE

South Korea faces significant security challenges arising from North Korea's nuclear and missile programs, further complicated by the geopolitical dynamics of the Korean Peninsula, which involves regional powers such as China and Russia. The strategic interests of these actors add layers of complexity to South Korea's defense strategy, necessitating the maintenance of a strong alliance with the United States while simultaneously managing pragmatic cooperation with China. As Sino-U.S. tensions escalate, this dual approach increasingly limits South Korea's strategic options. This study critically analyzes the benefits and trade-offs associated with alliance-based defense strategies for small states, using South Korea as a case study. Specifically, it explores two interrelated dimensions: first, the indispensable role of the ROK-U.S. alliance in countering North Korea's military threats, and second, the influence of the ongoing hegemonic competition in the region on South Korea's strategic decision-making. The findings underscore how small states securing their survival through alliances navigate the dual risks of abandonment and entrapment imposed by their allies.
