

Is Remediated Groundwater Meeting SDWA Requirements?

James A. Goodrich, Benjamin W. Lykins Jr., Robert M. Clark, and E. Timothy Oppelt

Treating groundwater for drinking purposes is quite different from treating it for site remediation. However, given that aquifer cleanup goals are becoming more stringent, it has been suggested that drinking water treatment technology be integrated into groundwater remediation strategies as a final polishing step and as a means of meeting the requirements of the Safe Drinking Water Act. This article discusses how traditional drinking water treatment technologies could be used for dealing with hazardous waste sites, including cost, performance, and applicability. Pump and treat technology as used in groundwater remediation is compared with that employed in drinking water applications.

Groundwater treatment concerns many water utilities and state, local, and federal programs, including drinking water, Superfund, underground storage tank, and Resource Conservation and Recovery Act programs. Frequently the same terms are used in the different programs with quite different meanings. For example, the phrase "pump and treat" means one thing when groundwater treatment for potable purposes is being considered and something quite different for Superfund remediation. Another confusing term is "site remediation." Site remediation can mean different things to different people depending on their particular point of view. Other problems are the development and use of technology under one program that could be used effectively in another program. Institutional barriers frequently limit the transfer of useful research between programs. This article discusses the technological research being conducted in the field of drinking water that might be useful to some of the other programs.

Once emergency remedial actions have been completed and long-term solutions are being evaluated, the decision-maker must be aware of the myriad regulations that need to be satisfied and the various treatment goals and objectives that federal, state, and local agencies want to accomplish. For example, the objective of an aquifer remediation program is usually to restore the aquifer to its original condition. Recent reviews of past remediations^{1,2} have shown that strategies that are effective in reducing tens or hundreds of milligrams per litre of various contaminants in highly polluted aquifers to a concentration of one milligram per litre or less can still leave behind groundwater that exceeds the maximum contaminant level (MCL) allowed by the Safe Drinking Water Act (SDWA). Therefore, additional treatment of the groundwater is required before the water can be consumed.

In contrast to an aquifer remediation program, the objective of water utilities and drinking water programs in pumping contaminated groundwater to the surface and then treating it is to provide potable drinking water and reduce consumers' exposure to the contaminants, without considering the changes in aquifer contamination. Pump and treat has been utilized in groundwater remediations to return the aquifer to its original condition. This is in essence a different application of pump and treat technology even though the terminology is the same. Aquifer and contaminant characteristics may prevent aquifer cleanup through simply pumping the water out, treating it, and pumping it back into the aquifer.

Current regulatory programs^a

Regulation	Number of Contaminants Regulated	Explanation
