

Close to home

Tropical rain forests and Antarctic seas are homes to many celebrity species, but it is in and around our own homes that we meet most of our wildlife. These encounters are formative at first, then ultimately much more rewarding than fantasies of exotic encounters fueled by television. To watch in "real time," to identify species that share our community, to relate to their lives and perhaps provide for them—even touch, feed, and smell them—this is the essential source of a real affinity with nature. And despite the harmful impact, so many animals and plants have managed to adapt to sharing our homes that meeting them can be an everyday event.
