

The Sounds of Social Change: Jazz and Country in 1920s America

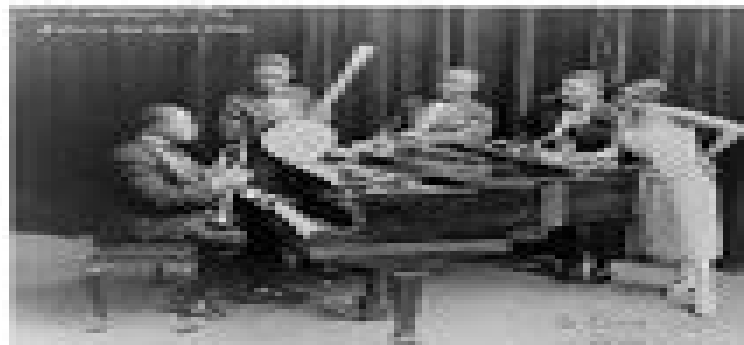

The United States was growing and changing in the 1920s. Over the past 100 years, the nation had ended slavery, defined its borders, and bravely served in World War I. Now, we had to figure out how to live together in peace.

American artists looked for ways to tell the story of our changing nation. They created two genres of music to express their feelings: jazz and country. Jazz was the perfect playlist for Black Americans moving North to look for work, and country music was the soundtrack of slower lifestyles, mostly in the South.

The country struggled with racism and sexism, too. Laws separated Native American children from their families and sent them to schools far from home. Unfair immigration policies kept Japanese families out of the country. Terrorist mobs burned down entire Black neighborhoods. All of these communities
