

allows him to fire the gun from under cover, out of the turret, and the vehicle's camouflage.

... tank's armament is estimated (at 100 tons) on the turret top on the glacis, but this is not true. Because of NATO's charge weapon systems, engineers have been well combined armour plate and this has appeared in the design, particularly in the turret. Whatever is like the British-designed suit is worked in slabs, as is undoubtedly common

The tank is known as the "explains the main drive" inside launch system, which is the American only limited success in the designation T-64B. A command version of the standard main tank is designated T-64K.

Despite—or, perhaps, because of—the fact that in so many ways the T-4g represented a major advance in Soviet design philosophy, in its early years it was a mine of trouble. The problems encountered with the auto-loader have already been mentioned, but in addition the fire control system proved unreliable, there were frequent suspension failures and breakdowns were a regular occurrence. At one point technical teams from the manufacturing plants became semi-permanent residents with units equipped with the tank. Even after most of the faults had been cured the T-4g did not serve outside the Soviet Army. Manufacture of the vehicle was discontinued in 1941.

The second new tank, the T-72, entered production in 1975 but was not seen by Western observers until 1977. Its general layout, armour and gunnery equipment are comparable with those of the T-62, but in other respects its designers have followed more traditional paths. The major areas of difference lay, first, in the use of a torsion bar suspension with six medium-sized, rubber-tyred roadwheels and three return rollers, and secondly in the choice of a turbocharged version of the well-cried V-12 diesel engine, capable of producing 750 hp at 3,000 rpm. Minor points of difference between the two types include a slightly larger engine deck on the T-72, a single exhaust tube moved on the left side of the turret, the location of the main infrared searchlight to the right of the main armament (as opposed to the left on the T-62), and

The T-70 main battle tank possesses the same armament and gunnery equipment as the T-69 but in other respects was developed along more traditional lines, as the replacement of medium-stroke rubber-tired roadshoes demonstrates. The inclined hull is increased on brackets on the left side of the turret
