Lagrangian Measurements of Eddy Characteristics in the California Current System James Gary Sires, 1997 During the Eastern Boundary Current program in 1993-96 Argos tracked surface drifters drogued to 15 m depth and satellite thermal imagery were used to provide a description of the mesoscale features in the California Current System off the northern California coast The drifter movements and satellite images revealed a highly energetic series of filaments and eddies that dominated the summer flow field off the coast similar to those noted in the earlier CODE OPTOMA and CTZ studies Winter mesoscale activity in the region was less energetic with the principle feature being the poleward flowing Davidson Current Translation rates for mesoscale eddies were deduced from drifter trajectories in the summer period Translation rates vorticity divergence and eddy center positions were also estimated for a cyclone and anticyclone sampled in July and September respectively by constraining observed drifter velocities to a linear Taylor expansion in the least square sense Translation rates from this technique were similar to those observed from previous shipboard surveys and drifter motions Using observations over 7-12 days the cyclonic anticyclonic eddy was determined to have a translation rate of 3.7-4.2 cm/s to the southwest The least square technique applied to shorter time periods however provided unreliable estimates of eddy properties when drifters were not evenly distributed around the eddy
