

The Energy Sector and Energy Policy in the Soviet Economy

Before proceeding to our main subject—the examination of Soviet energy technology and its use in efforts to build up Soviet production in general—please let me stress once again the Soviet Union's role in the world arena of the energy sector of energy policy in the postwar years. This chapter discusses the Soviet energy resources base, some distinctive features of the structure of the supply and demand for energy in the Soviet economy, and the establishment of the overall framework of energy policy. The final section summarizes the energy sector's importance in a socialist or planned economic structure.

ENERGY RESOURCES

The nature of the Soviet energy resources base has important consequences for Soviet energy policy and for the direction of its efforts in energy R and D. The Soviet Union's energy resources are large enough that it can make the trade-off between its own efforts to develop them or use of them made in exports. It is the only large industrial country in that position. But the economic characteristics of its energy resources are not especially attractive, and most of its internal energy choices and the direction of its energy R and D are conditioned by that fact—its quality, transportability, and other economic features of these energy resources. The best way to convey the situation is to describe briefly the major components of the energy resources base.

Coal*

Soviet authorities like us very much the USSR has more built the coal resources of the world. This is based on their estimates of 4,000 billion tons of "general-geological" reserves, divided by 300 million tons and by 100 million tons of "proven-geological" reserves, divided by 300 million tons and by 100 million tons of "proven-geological" reserves, divided by 300 million tons and by 100 million tons of "proven-geological" reserves.

More important than reserves are the reserves base for the USSR's Coal-Geological Fund of 1950-1955 and 1956-1960, and 1961-1965.

*The following discussion is based mostly on statistics, 1950-1955.

†The above is based on the USSR's, estimates of the Soviet energy resources base. The definition of these resources is rather broad, but the energy R and D needed to develop them sufficiently will depend on specific production decisions.
