The Transition of Students with Learning Disabilities: A Case Study

Sheryl Evelo & Lynda Price
General College-University of Minnesota

Abstract

This case study illustrates the transition process of one individual with learning disabilities during a 3 year period. It describes her experiences as she graduated from high school and went on to a local community college. Specific transition objectives, personalized counseling, and individual accommodations are discussed in detail, with both secondary and postsecondary examples. Relevant research and recommendations pertinent to service providers who work with adolescents and adults with learning disabilities are also provided.

Introduction

One of the most topical transition issues being examined today is the service delivery for adolescents and adults with learning disabilities. There are currently numerous articles, conference presentations and even books focused on this new and frequently unexplored area. And yet, many questions still remain. In order to understand and better define the transition process for students with learning disabilities, we have chosen a case study approach to provide a comprehensive example of what transition is and how it was addressed with one student. It is hoped that the information derived from this case study will not only expand knowledge of transition but assist service providers in facilitating the successful transition of students from school to postsecondary settings and employment.

The framework for the service delivery to the student with learning disabilities in this study was provided through the LD Transition Project, a 3-year, federally-funded research/demonstration project located at the General College of the University of Minnesota. Forty high school juniors and seniors with learning disabilities were selected by the Project transition counselors. These participants received intensive, personalized service over a 3-year period as they moved from the secondary to postsecondary setting of their choice.
